Safety:

RIVER RULES

The Oklahoma Department of Tourism has published a few “Rules of the River” which serve as a fundamental guide to safe canoeing.

• Stay with your overturned craft, if possible. It has flotation and will help you stay afloat until you reach shallow water.
• Wear life preserves, especially in water where capsizing is possible. Small children should ALWAYS WEAR PRESERVERS.
• Do not grab or hold fixed objects while moving in swift water. This is a sure way to capsize.
• If your canoe becomes lodged against a fixed object, try to carefully work your way around the object. Never push directly away from it.
• When you reach water that may be unsafe – stop, survey the situation, and plan your route if you intend to run it. Currents are always stronger than they look. Never underestimate them.
• Always distribute weight and gear evenly and tie in valuable items.
• Don’t forget your partner when in trouble. You may be the only one who can immediately help. Know and realize your own strength, endurance and capabilities.

During the summer, an overturned canoe usually means a harmless dunking but when the water level is high, it can be dangerous. When a dunking appears certain, always bail out of the upstream side. It is usually best to try to hang onto the overturned craft for flotation, but if it is in timber or brush, be careful. Continued next page…

Other than the threat of drowning to a non-swimmer, winding up on the wrong side of an overturned canoe is the greatest hazard a floater faces.

While there is no white water at flood stage, the force of the downstream current is simply awesome. In a matter of minutes, it can bend an aluminum canoe around a tree. When the current pins a swamped canoe against a fixed object, it takes several grown men to remove it. If a paddler is caught between the two, he or she is often in a life-or-death situation.

Someone should be able to maneuver the canoe, making it turn right or left, or hold a true course, You do not alternate paddling to one side or the other which results in a zigzag route from one bank to another. You cannot paddle on opposite sides either as the strongest partner will prevail.

The person in the stern (the rear) can control the canoe by using the paddle like a rudder. The bowman merely supplies power on demand. The stern man should be able to guide the canoe with just a slight turn of the tilted paddle as it trails over the side. When an out-of-control canoe goes broadside to the current while approaching rapids or an obstacle, its occupants are about to be dumped.

WEAR YOUR LIFE JACKET!
